Leachate is the primary water inflow into a constructed wetland treating domestic wastewater in southern California, USA. This study examined how leachate from a phosphorus-removal (P-R) wetland impacted the microbial community composition and activity. Denitrifying phosphorus removal (DPR) occurs in two separate wastewater treatment plants, where leachate from the latter is used to augment the former. This study focused on three streams (one from the P-R wetland influent and two from the P-R wetland effluent) sampled over two time periods. Leachate treatment reduced nitrate and ammonium concentrations and produced ammonium oxidation products, but increased phosphorous concentrations. Leachate altered the microbial community structure as measured by cluster analysis and revealed a shift toward denitrifying, sulfate-reducing, and iron-oxidizing organisms in the leachate. More than 60% of the microbial diversity in the P-R wetland influent was carried over to the P-R wetland effluent. The results demonstrate the biological effects of the infiltration of wastewater into a constructed wetland.Less than two weeks after a series of bomb attacks shook Russia, with officials attributing them to Islamic State (Istis), a new law is being planned by President Vladimir Putin that will block access to social networking sites. The proposed legislation comes as part of a wider Russian drive to increase online surveillance and tracking of people's activities. Under the proposed law, being drafted by the country's communications ministry, all sites providing "mass communication" (read social networking sites) will be banned for Russians. The sites would not be defined, but would be clearly identified as "forbidden" and contain a big red "ban" icon. The content of "mass communication
